First, to determine whether the occurrence of dementia is associated with mechanical failure of the blood-brain barrier (BBB) leading to an increase in circulating blood cells. Second, to examine whether the BBB is a critical component of the neuroimmune communication necessary for the appropriate immune response in the brain to encephalitogenic/inflammatory agents. To accomplish these goals, we will conduct two independent sets of experiments. In the first, we will use a murine model for autoimmune encephalomyelitis (EAE) and immunosuppressive drugs that compromise the function of endothelial cells of the BBB to induce EAE while leaving circulating blood cells intact. This approach will allow us to determine if an intact BBB is necessary for EAE to occur, i.e., whether the vascular pathology of EAE is sufficient to cause immunologic T cell infiltration and encephalitogenicity. In the second set of experiments, we will utilize the methodology of electron microscopy to evaluate the neuroimmune interface on a molecular level in the mouse (mouse EAE model) and the rat (rat EAE model). Both approaches will provide the opportunity to examine the BBB in a whole animal, i.e., in the setting where both the neuroimmune interface and circulating blood cells are intact. We hypothesize that the occurrence of dementia is associated with vascular dysfunction leading to increased circulation of blood-borne cells. This will initiate a cascade of vascular events, including infiltration by T cells, resulting in CNS inflammation and dysfunction of CNS neurons and finally the appearance of neurodegenerative symptoms. We also hypothesize that an intact BBB is necessary for the appropriate immune response in the brain to encephalitogenic agents. In order to establish the normal regulation of the neuroimmune interface in the brain, it is necessary to have the role of the blood-brain interface defined. These two
